About The Home

By Frances Dell

All good cooks are conscious of favor. However, there are good cooks who ignore a very important factor when planning meals. The often over-looked factor is texture.

Imagine eating a meal of mashed potatoes, creamed chicken, split pea soup and custard. While each dish may taste delicious, the whole effect would be monotonous, texturally.

The French and the Chinese rate texture in foods as high as flavor. Yet Americans, as a whole, seem to be unaware of how textures can add piquancy and appeal to menus.

Texture-wise cooking involves three things: preparation, combination of different textures in various dishes in the menu, and combining different textures in one single dish.

The preparation of foods for cooking regulates the length of time they must be cooked - thus emphasizing the flavor and texture. For example. Frenched string beans merely broken. If this fact is kept in mind and the cooking time shortened, they lose less flavor and crispness.

The interplay of textures in the various dishes of a menu can be achieved correctly by combining the fibers of meat, the smoothness of vegetables and the firm, crispness of a salad.

Combining various textures makes for a very interesting and appealing dish. The Chinese are outstanding in this type of cooking. Crispness and creaminess are the two main texture-contrasts found in Oriental cooking.

Health and Beauty

It is well to bear in mind that dangerous germs are always present in the normal skin, especially in the fold around the hair follicles and in the oil glands about the nose and back. As a rule they cause no harm but are capable of causing serious infections if a person's skin becomes broken or abraded, or the vitality is for any reason lowered.

When the skin is kept in a healthy condition, face powder is a great aid to beauty. It removes the shiny appearance, so sought after by the African; but deprecated by the Caucasian. It also partially conceals minor defects such as discolorations and so forth.

The powder does not clog the pores and cause blackheads if removed at night by cream or by washing the face. In fact, it really acts as a protection - covering against biting winds and direct rays of the sun. The foundation lotion or cream prevents the powder from coming off and gives the skin a softer and more velvety sheen.

During the day if you wish to freshen your appearance, lie down for a short period, if you have time close your eyes and relax every muscle in your body. Fall asleep if you can. On awakening, take a short, hot bath, finishing with a dash of cold water. Rub with a crash towel until the whole body is glowing from the friction. Put some fresh lotion on your face and remove excess with

Carver-Price School News

Hello Readers!

The fourth six-weeks ended the 15th of March. The following students were on the "B" Honor Roll:

12th grade: William Burce, Celestine Chambers, William Forbes, Hazel Gafford, James Gafford, Mary Goode, Annie Megginson.

11th grade: Herbert Williams.

Mary Goode represented Carver-Price at the Grace E. Harris District I Organization for the NHA Girls in Halifax, recently. She gave a report of the meeting Monday at NHA meeting. Celestine Chambers and Mary Goode were appointed to help work on the constitutional committee.

The Omega Fraternity Talent Hunt was held at Virginia State College Friday, March 15, at 8:00 o'clock. Juanita Lipford, of 7th grade, represented Carver Price with a solo entitled, "If God I Follow You." Miss C. N. Sergon, the music instructor, played the music.

Now that basketball season is coming to a close with various tournaments all over the country this week-end, the major leagues and many colleges have begun preparations for the coming baseball season. This is no exception at Carver-Price, where twenty-eight boys responded to earn positions on this season's baseball team.

Baseball is one of the highest paid games in sports and this will add to tougher competition because each boy will lbe trying to catch the eye of some major league scout in this area.

The Panthers will be playing about a 10 game schedule, which is not completed at the time the paper went to press. We are all hoping for a most successful season here, and are looking forward to seeing some of our boys in professional baseball.

We close with this thought for the week: "No man was ever great without divine inspiration."

Fitchburg, Mass.- Although Mrs. Louisa I. Smart celebrated her 100th birthday on February 20, she has flown 22,000 miles and is looking forward to another air trip this summer.

Just why the jetstreams form, and how, are still questions not fully answered. But they are up there, and often flow at a speed of 100 knots or better. The airlines plan to take increasing advantage of them. And some experts believe they exert an influence on our weather, or at least represent symptoms of changing patterns of the weather.

Another model will be a so-called "professional" model and will be used by dairy herd improvement association supervisors. This model will be stainless steel and will meter to the nearest one-tenth of a pound. It wil lhave a built-in sampling device for taking milk samples for butterfat testing.

None of the models has been approved for official weighing and sampling of milk, but Dr. Graf says they look very promising and doubtless will be approved after a few more tests.

KNOW THE WEATHER

By E. H. Sims

What are the jetstreams? Do they affect our weather? How can they aid air transportation and when and how were they discovered?

The jetstreams are still something of a mystery but more is being learned about them every year. During World War II, U. S. pilots were surprised to discover they sometimes suddenly encountered fast-moving air currents, or streams, which affected their speed considerably. This was always at high altitude.

These air currents flow generally west to east, like the weather. They sometimes shift south and north as weather fronts do, changing with the seasons, to different latitudes during different times of the year.

An Air Force bomber, hitching a lift on one of them this year, crossed the country in something over three hours, west to east. In the Pacific, an airline found that utilizing an airstream over that ocean eliminated one fuel stop, and cut flying
